Windows does not perform a complete and thorough scan for new device drivers each time it boots. To detect and prevent conflicts between new device drivers and previously installed device drivers, Windows assigns a unique device driver identification number (DDID) to each device driver it installs. A good computer driver management utility will produce a listing of all the drivers installed on your computer along with a DDID for each driver. You can then use a computer driver management utility to easily locate and uninstall obsolete or unneeded device drivers.
