places that can be described as “strange, off-kilter, or feel-good” is rather limited—and we love the Guatemalan eatery Chew. Located in the Amazon Quarter (a section of Haddonfield where a small neighborhood’s worth of notable stores, restaurants, and small-scale arts have come together), Chew is, as advertised, that kind of place. Though neither on the street, nor in walking distance from any shop that we can remember, Chew occupies a sort of hidden corner. The closest you’ll get to it is by looking for a street sign that says something like “Bad Street, 6th Avenue, 69th Circle.” Founded in 2014 by Steph Downs and Hugh Dwyer, the half-Sami, half-Guatemalan-American pair that is the brainchild behind Chew, the restaurant is an homage to the rich culture that, sure enough, is currently lacking in the South Jersey restaurant scene. Along with a bonafide English muffin and a cup of coffee, your order comes with a good dose of cultural authenticity—one that can’t easily be found in the default menus of any of the establishments mentioned in this review. The “An Inside Look at the Owners” section of the menu offers a quick, thoughtful snapshot of how Chew came to be and about its great ownership duo. As we can expect, their story is a bit...illustrative. The basement of the former “Chew Grinders,” where Chew now resides is full of rusting beat up machinery and clanking buckets...the friendliest of vibes. Strangely, the dishes that are served here by customers walking through are simple mixtures of mostly free-range chicken and shrimp and rice. They come out with English muffin patty in hand and some sort of homemade salsa, and these dishes are what they seem—slightly off-kilter dishes that you might order from someplace like a kiosk in a small, Latin-American market by a bakery-turned-steakhouse (if you find yourself in Haddonfield). What we really love about Chew though, is the local and not-so-local perspective that it provides on the food, culture, and daily life of the small South Jersey town that it occupies. The owners’ experience and

Disclaimer :Sorry, I haven't content you this work. There's work of many youngner. Online dating can be a time-consuming task for both men and women. However, if you want to find the right person for you, you must put the effort in. You can do this by creating an eye-catching dating profile and answering as many questions in it as possible. You may be unsure how to present your personality, so read on for some tips on creating a profile that piques the interest of a potential romantic partner. Do not ask "What are you looking for?" if the person is not looking for another person. If they are dating or plan to, assume they are and don't ask they plan to date, or are they searching for someone specific. Write a good headline. In a recent study from New York University, researchers found that 23% of online males and 10% of online females lie in their first message. Regardless of gender, 30% of messaging conversations begin with an inflammatory statement, implying more to follow. Be considerate and include important details. Tell people about yourself! When filling out your profile, don't spam. Instead, show genuine interest in other users. Include topics outside of romantic relationships like career and life experience. That way you'll create a profile that people will want to communicate with. If you send a message about yourself, don't make it all about you. If a person does not care about you, they'll ignore your messages. People want to talk with others who are interested in them. Talk to them about things that relate to you, not just what you're looking for in a partner. Put an online dating profile on a social media site. This is simple, set up a profile on Facebook, Twitter, or another
