To investigate the effects of 5-hydroxytryptamine (5-HT) on cell migration of rat pulmonary artery smooth muscle cells (PASMCs) in vitro, a cell migration model was used in which the cultured PASMCs were scratched to form the wound area and were cultured for 12 h. The time course of wound closure was observed under an inverted microscope. The effects of 5-HT on the migration of PASMCs were investigated by using the scratch assay. The mechanisms of the effects of 5-HT on cell migration were further investigated by using the MTT method, tricyclic antidepressant method and reverse transcriptase polymerase chain reaction. 5-HT at concentrations from 5×10^{-6} mol/L to 5×10^{-5} mol/L could effectively inhibit the migration of PASMCs. The inhibitory effects were enhanced with increasing concentrations of 5-HT. Morphological observation showed that 10×10^{-5} mol/L 5-HT induced morphological changes in the cells. The MTT method showed that 5-HT at the concentrations from 5×10^{-5} mol/L to 5×10^{-3} mol/L could inhibit the proliferation of PASMCs in a dose-dependent manner, and the inhibitory effects were significantly increased with increasing concentrations of 5-HT. Tricyclic antidepressant method showed that the inhibition of 5-HT on the migration of PASMCs could be antagonized by imipramine, clomipramine and desmethylimipramine. Reverse transcriptase polymerase chain reaction showed that 5-HT at the concentrations from 5×10^{-7} mol/L to 5×10^{-6} mol/L could inhibit the expression of mitogen-activated protein kinase (MAPK) and nuclear factor kappa B (e79caf774b
