Terminator 2: Judgment Day, Hindi dubbed.A discussion in the recently released National Climate Assessment about the future of the United States if the nation does not act to limit greenhouse gas emissions provides a glimpse of where scientists think climate change is heading. "With continued high greenhouse gas emissions, the atmospheric concentration of GHGs is projected to rise and eventually reach levels at which some components of climate could change abruptly," the report says. "The most widespread and substantial changes in projected climate are the loss of the Arctic summer sea ice and the permafrost on land, the loss of snow and ice on mountains, and the expansion of deserts and savannas. There may be a shift in monsoonal circulation patterns, and altered precipitation patterns in the tropics." Though the report is blunt and factual, it is based on the latest evidence showing that the atmosphere is warming, that the ocean is absorbing and storing more energy than it's releasing, and that future warming of the planet is inevitable, and that we can expect ever more severe weather-related events. The last of those things, though, isn't so well understood: how will nature adapt to warming, and what will that look like? The fact that climate change has been going on since before humans, and that humans have been aware of it for only a few decades, suggests that the effects of climate change will present themselves as shocks to society. "How do you think about the future when you don't know where the future will lead?" asked Kevin Trenberth, a climatologist at the National Center for Atmospheric Research. "You have to model that, and then model different scenarios of what will happen if it doesn't get much worse." So what does that future look like, and will it really be as bad as some scenarios suggest? "
