A word of caution: Even though Photoshop is a popular tool among photographers, design pros and students, it is best used by people who understand what it is and what it can do, what its limitations are and what it is best used for. ## Understanding Photoshop Layers When you work with Photoshop, you create a new layer at all times. The reason to make a new layer is that you may want to place more than one image or text layer on the same image. You can easily edit multiple layers without affecting the others, by altering each individual layer. Photoshop layers are like sheets of paper or sheets of fabric. When you place a new layer, you turn the white of the paper over to the back of the sheet. Then you place your images or text on top of the previous layer, and you move the topmost layer down to the back of the sheet. On the back of the sheet, you add another layer and repeat the process. You continue until you no longer need to make additional layers, and then you remove them all. In the process, you've turned back the white of the paper over to reveal the opposite side. For example, imagine a photo that you want to share on your website. You make a new layer on the back and add your image to the new layer. You then make an additional layer on the back of the same sheet of paper and add more content to that layer. Repeat until you no longer need to make additional layers. When you finish, the white of the paper is on the back of the sheet and the original photo is visible. By adding and removing layers, you can reuse the same elements several times in different ways. For example, you can add a layer that contains all of the images you want to keep from a family portrait that needs to be edited. Then you remove that layer and save the original image. Note that a Photoshop layer is essentially a digital stamp. You place images or text on a layer, and when you save or print the file, the new layer replaces what you just added. A Photoshop document is simply a container in which multiple layers reside. After you make a layer, you save it as a file. You can create, move, and resize a layer as well as merge it with other layers or duplicate it. You can add text to a layer by typing on the layer or into a placeholder field. You can apply filters to the text, such as the ones you read

Advertising Read more Warsaw (AFP) Russian President Vladimir Putin denied on Friday he had ordered any such "punishments" and insisted in the strongest terms that anti-government protests were staged by "opposition forces" to undermine Russia's "prestige". Police on Tuesday detained more than 40 people, including opposition leader Alexei Navalny, during mass arrests at two anti-corruption rallies in Moscow that were called in reaction to a proposed increase in fuel prices. Putin, who arrived in Warsaw on Friday on his first foreign trip since Russia's March 18 presidential election that he won by an overwhelming margin, insisted there was a "difference between law enforcement and security services". The Kremlin leader was speaking at a news conference held with Polish

Prime Minister Mateusz Morawiecki at the start of an economic summit co-chaired by the two countries, where economic cooperation will be a key focus. Putin insisted that the detentions had been carried out in an "orderly manner" and that they were a response to a "coup" by the opposition to "spread fear and destabilise the country". He insisted the protests had not been an anti-corruption rally and "were not organised by any politicians or any officials". Asked whether he had ordered any such sanctions, he replied: "I did not, I did not." "It was not my order," he added. - 'No sanctions' - Putin said he thought the next round of protests were to be held "so there can be no doubt" about the opposition's intentions. He said it had not received any "affirmative" response from the opposition, but added that "we will look into it". The Moscow rally was held in response to a proposed price hike for a traditional Novogratz cigarettes, while the nationwide rally was prompted by a bill to tax the internet. An all-out crackdown on protesters following the rallies has left hundreds injured.

The opposition has rejected accusations of instigating violence. Putin said he thought the situation in Russia was "calm". Asked whether the opposition protests had a role in events in Ukraine, Putin said: "No, these protests were not organised. The next will be too if necessary. And they will be presented as a protest and not a coup." "They are not able to have any influence on our democratic procedures, on my electoral
