The mechanisms responsible for producing sleep spindles are not well understood. The recent discovery of spindles arising from bilateral thalamic activity has shown that thalamic neurons can generate a different range of electrical activity than previously thought. It has also been suggested that a single source of afferent inputs may be responsible for the generation of spindles by thalamic neurons. In this study, slow-wave spindles were recorded from the thalamus and neocortex simultaneously during quiet wakefulness, and the sleep stage distributions were compared. Slow-wave sleep spindles were detected in the neocortex of 50% of the thalamically recorded neurons in one of eight rats but in none of the neocortically recorded neurons in the other seven rats. Thus, the thalamus and neocortex have different patterns of spindle generation during slow wave sleep.[IMAGE] [IMAGE] PLEASE VISIT OUR SPONSORS: FREE MEALS with Lifetime.com's eDiets.com7 Dining.com - $7.95 shipping.
