An ultrastructural study. Tumorlike blood vessel proliferation at various stages of development is well recognized in thymic hyperplasia, but its importance in lymphoid hemangioma has been questioned. Although the importance of venous dysplasia in the pathogenesis of lymphoid hemangioma is also uncertain, it cannot be ruled out. Therefore, 12 cases of benign lymphoid hemangioma were studied with special regard to the occurrence and distribution of venous dysplasia. The specimens were obtained from routinely fixed paraffin sections, while the tissue processing and tissue collection for electron microscopy were performed on fresh material. Venous dysplasia was found in all cases and in some of them it was extensive. Some cases had striking differences in the vascularity of the hemangioma with concomitant differences in the degree of dysplasia. In addition, striking changes in the endothelial nuclei were found in the dysplastic vessels, which may be a histologic sign of active dysplasia. These results further strengthen the concept that venous dysplasia is an important contributing factor in the pathogenesis of lymphoid hemangioma. Neisseria meningitidis and group B streptococci: Comparative membrane fatty acid and outer core protein composition studies. Comparative studies of membrane fatty acid composition and outer core protein composition of 11 clinical strains of Neisseria meningitidis and 4 clinical strains of group B beta-hemolytic streptococci were carried out. The meningococcal strains were divided into 12 lipid classes on the basis of silica gel thin layer chromatographic separations of their lipid extracts. Fatty acid analysis showed a predominant lipid class in all strains containing mainly saturated fatty acids, with
