Small-business lending Career Center Stories Small business lending How to Borrow Money for Your Small Business Whether you are just starting your business or planning on expanding your service offerings, you may want to consider a loan. Finding a funding source may be challenging for a new business, especially if you don't already have a track record and you don't know anyone who would be willing to finance you. Despite the challenge, there are options, including grants, tax credits, and a variety of private sources. Many small-business owners seek private funding to ensure that they don't have to take out a loan from a bank or other lender at the wrong time for their business. Perhaps you need funding to prepare for a major expansion, buy new equipment, or just to pay for something that will keep you at work and keep customers coming back for more. Whatever your needs, there are options. Small-Business Loans Small-business loans are a critical ingredient in the small business funding mix. The loan types available include business owner's, equity, asset-based, and revolving. Business owner's loans are often called owner's equity or carry-along loan, and can be used by the owner, an investor, or as part of a loan package involving several individual owners or lenders. The business owner, an individual partner, or a couple may use the money to buy equipment, expand a line of business, or hire more staff. The purpose of the loan is to create equity in the business and create buying power among owners. The owner's equity loan is often easier to access than bank loans because the banks require a personal guarantee for the loan. Owner's loans are collateral free, meaning there is no need to use personal collateral to secure the loan. Equity is the amount of money you put up to own the business. It is often thought of as the "bread" of a business. The business owner puts in the equity, the business generates the revenue, and when the business turns a profit, the owner gets back their money. The name for equity often reflects the percentage of equity that is put up. For example, if the business owner puts down 30 percent of the value of the business, the owner will have an equity stake of 30 percent. The cost of the owner's equity (the interest rate) has to be taken into account when calculating the amount
