Now, based on the eye-popping level of media bloat on Windows 8 (native apps included), I would recommend caution here. If you have a laptop system with only 8GB of RAM, you could run into a catastrophic error log caused by the huge high compression media assets coupled with PC workloads that spawn multiple apps.

Shooting with RAW has two problems. One is that it's more complex than JPEG -- when you shoot a RAW file, you have to tell the camera how to render it back. The other one is that RAW comes in huge files, and compressing RAW files is hard. Believe me, I have shot thousands of RAWs. That's why the original RAW image format has been around for at least 15 years. Even though Photoshop is a professional workhorse and is mainly targeted to photographers, I recommend using Lightroom for beginners. A powerful alternative to Photoshop, Lightroom has everything you need for basic to advanced darkroom development. It is mainly designed for managing image collections, yet when you are ready to work in the darkroom on a few selected images, you can easily switch to Photoshop. Lightroom also has one of the best image catalogs I've ever seen and an excellent outline (labels) system (to some). This makes catalog management exceptionally fast and easy. You can search for all images in one file using keywords, people, places, time period, etc. Lightroom indexes catalog data once or twice a day, so you can access and work with images without annoying delays. When moving to Lightroom, the one reason I still use Photoshop occasionally are actions: a set of actions that automate specific steps in most of my workflows.
