It's an excellent method of entering comments, but sometimes you'll create a preview in an image editor and email it to reviewers. Actually, I like this method far more than Adobe's feature. Snapshots should be used for commenting on a finalized version of an image, not during the editing process. When we're talking about commenting, I am making use of the "Snapshot Comments" feature. Please note that all currently available features are very rudimentary. We will continue to evolve and improve the finder, camera engine, and other features to give you rich editing experience - not just the ability to take a photo. As you can see, we have several different types of features when we're ready to roll out our version 3.0, such as the real time monitor, real time image editing and composition, and so on. A closeup of some of the features that it will have when it is ready. e3d0a04c9c
