It is well known to make steel by the basic process of heating a molten steel bath to the melting point of the steel, and by continuously supplying the molten bath with a stream of molten material or charge which is delivered from a delivery lance situated above the bath. The steel baths themselves may be regarded as generally containing (a) all the solids formed during the continuous casting process, (b) the required oxygen for the oxidation of carbon in the steel bath, (c) the heat required for maintaining the liquid steel, and (d) all the transfer media to carry the molten steel to the required points in the apparatus. In the conventional practice a continuous casting or mould in the form of a continuous steel beam or ingot is formed as it flows along the casting line, the cross-sectional outline of the beam being progressively reduced as the casting is advanced. The continuous beams produced may take any desired shape, as, for example, ingots, slabs or plates, but in general the shape may be rectangular. In many applications it is conventional to heat a continuous casting to a high temperature--for example, by blowing air or other gas into the liquid bath to produce turbulence, and a certain degree of separation of the liquid and solid mass formed. To produce a high carbon steel of high strength, it is conventional to add a relatively large proportion of carbon to the molten steel bath. However, after prolonged use the bath tends to develop what is referred to as "phosphatizing" which is a loosely adherent, abrasive layer of metallic phosphorous on the solidified surface of the steel. Such a layer is prone to rust, and it has been found that the wear rate of the grain of the cast steel is increased by the presence of such a layer. In conventional practice, oxygen is added to the bath, as by blowing it into the bath from outside of the continuous casting line, in order to oxidize the carbon in the steel bath and prevent the formation of the relatively non-oxidizing layer of phosphorous.
