Nutritional status, immune response and intestinal microbiota in children with vesico-amniotic shunts: Nutritional status, immune response and intestinal microbiota in children with vesico-amniotic shunts. The aim of the study was to investigate the nutritional status and the immune response, and the interactions between them, in children with vesico-amniotic shunts. We analyzed four groups of patients (I: children with vesico-amniotic shunts; II: children with vesico-amniotic shunts in the presence of anorexia nervosa; III: children with anorexia nervosa; IV: healthy children). Patients with vesico-amniotic shunts had reduced weight ($p < 0.001$), height ($p < 0.001$) and body mass index ($p < 0.001$) compared to the healthy group. No differences were found between the children with vesico-amniotic shunts and the children with anorexia nervosa. The percentages of lymphocytes that were B cells, and eosinophils were significantly higher in group I than in all the other groups ($p < 0.001$). The percentage of B cells in group I was significantly higher than in group II ($p = 0.010$), while no differences were found among groups II, III and IV. The percentage of eosinophils was significantly higher in group II than in groups I ($p < 0.001$) and III ($p = 0.046$). The colonic content of Bacteroides, as determined by qRT-PCR, was
