Is there a way to turn it off or it's completely useless feature? A: Go to File → Settings → IDE Settings and search for "project". Check "Use caches for project roots". This will cache the project hierarchy for just that project, including for subprojects. Differential expression of myo-inositol and phytate accumulation in leaves of Lotus japonicus. Myo-inositol is an essential nutrient in plants and one of the most powerful antioxidants. It is well known that plant phytic acid is the major storage form of P in phytic acid d0c515b9f4

I have a main program that repeats until I press ctrl+c. programName = "program" def main(): print "Start" main(programName) print "End" def main(programName): print programName codeA codeB codeC codeD Each of the 'code' functions do a simple operation and then return the result. This works, but I would like to be able to perform the main program and the 'code' function as a series of threads rather than the main program being in a loop. To be honest I'm not really sure how this would work, but I have read that I should use a Lock(), but I can't figure out how to use it with my current program, any help would be appreciated! Edit: If you are wondering about what I am trying to achieve. I am trying to have 4 threads running that the main program can join onto, then each of these threads is doing a job. A: In python 3.x, you can use threads to execute the code asynchronously. Your example needs to be altered to use threads. from functools import partial def main(): print("Start") main_function(arguments) print("End") def main_function(program_name): print(program_name) with open(program_name, 'r') as f: code = partial(codeA, open(program_name).read()) code(arguments) code = partial(codeB, open(program_name).read()) code(arguments) code =
