(Don Hansen photo) By David McElroy The Department of Homeland Security is working to expand the use of home-based Internet cafes to provide real-time security analysis, detection and monitoring in support of the Department of Defense's global war on terrorism. "We are working with the Defense Intelligence Agency, working with the military," said Frank A. Biase, undersecretary of the Department of Homeland Security, "to expand the deployment of the Pentagon's Intelligence Analytic Support Activity, or IASA, to provide real-time security analysis, detection and monitoring on the home computer networks of the Department of Defense and then disseminate it to the community," he said. The spokesman for the Defense Intelligence Agency, Timothy O'Shea, echoed that message. "Most of the counter-intelligence we do is conducted within the military," he said. "We're working with the community at the [Department of Homeland Security] to coordinate our activities."

Influenza-like illness among returned travellers and risk factors: a case-control study. The burden of influenza-like illness (ILI) among returned travellers may be underestimated due to inadequate surveillance and non-optimal ILI case definition. This study compares the influenza and ILI case burden as well as the risk of influenza infection among returned travellers with ILI and age- and sex-matched healthy controls. Medical records of all ILI cases at a travel health clinic and age- and sex-matched controls were reviewed. The adjusted odds ratios (aORs) of ILI and influenza infection were estimated using logistic regression models. The estimated influenza and ILI cases burden among residents of Belgium (3.2/10,000) and the estimated influenza case burden among residents of the United States (3.0/10,000) were more than 2 times higher than estimated ILI and influenza burden among returned travellers. The median age of those acquiring influenza was 9.5 years. Compared to controls, returned travellers more commonly acquired influenza (aOR: 22.8, 95% confidence interval [CI]: 8.0-65.6) and had more than 10 days of ILI symptoms (aOR: 5.8, 95% CI: 1.4-23.7). There was no significant difference in viral etiology in ILI cases. The estimated ILI case burden among returned travellers, particularly among very young children, is more than twice the ILI burden among general Belgian and US populations. This burden is substantially underestimated due to lack of surveillance and non-optimal case definition. Improved surveillance for ILI among returned travellers is needed to better assess the burden of disease and the overall efficacy of travel medicine. "First things first, I would say we are down to 10. So I would not call it a hike," Councilman
