Permanent Television The top reason why there is no getting out of this moment is that we have lost the ability to get things done in a serious, thoughtful, collaborative way. To wit: the Republicans have seized the House; the president has (and I use this word loosely) blown his campaign promise to win the “war on coal,” and...you get the idea. Post navigation 2 thoughts on “Permanent Television” The Dems and the GOP are both losing. We have too many losers in D.C. We have the entrenched interests, big money, entrenched power interests, the broken politics of the past, and the partisan bought-and-paid-for government, etc., among many other things. I think we’ve lost the ability to get things done in a serious, thoughtful, collaborative way. To wit, the Republicans have seized the House. The only ones who can get things done are the President, his lawyers, the Chief of Staff, the Chief of Staff’s Press Secretary, and the President’s Press Secretary. The Republicans will have little say in this new Congressional majority because they will have no power or influence. I think they have lost the ability to get things done. I don’t think the Republicans are stupid or evil people. They lost the ability to get anything done through the absurdly rigid party leadership. We should be focusing on how to get something done for the country instead of spending so much time looking at the House of Representatives. I used to think that the country’s total failure would come when the republican or Democratic party in Congress would re-write the constitution, and change the balance of government power. I still think that is possible. But neither party is going to do this now. We are stuck with the political gridlock that has gripped the Washington establishment since the 1970s. An interesting place to look at the effects of this gridlock is in the massive growth in the size and scope of government in the 20th century. For example, in the first 100 years of our history, government was only the size it is today. The damage of this has been increased since the 1970s by big money power groups and special interests.
