websitesWhy rugby union needs a replay One of the most remarkable features of the 2009 Rugby World Cup was the way it highlighted the enormous differences between teams. For a nation whose team struggles to make an appearance in the World Cup quarter-finals, these two teams have become all too familiar. Both previously of the Six Nations Grand Slam, both superb coaches and two of the best players of their generation. Scotland and Wales could hardly be further apart in their domestic rugby allegiances - Scotland are no strangers to friends with the English, with a famous clash at Murrayfield in 2000 still bitter to the Scots' ears - but England and Wales find themselves closer than they have been since their emergence as separate countries in 1973. Within weeks of their Six Nations encounters, Wales and England are likely to be reunited in the biggest clash of their rivalry. It seems no coincidence that after months of scrutiny of the English backline and of England's attack, the final of the World Cup was a game with no clear winner. The tournament's most popular event was, in fact, the Wales v New Zealand semi-final in Cardiff, an event not so much missed as described by commentators as a 'bunch of duffers'. What is equally important to remember is that this result could have had severe repercussions. If the winner of the World Cup final had lost their semi-final, then the possible champions of the future could have been the host nation, the runners-up or - as in 2003 - the unlikely winners of a European bonus point race. But the drama of a game that went five minutes without scoring has been forgotten, and the intense focus of the last week of the world's most popular sport has been on the bland (and in some ways predictable) ending to a tournament that saw no decisive matches. It could be argued that if the tournament's pool stages were ransacked by Welsh and English challengers to the New Zealand starting point, then the semi-finals were all that was needed. Whatever the rights and wrongs of that argument, the results have left an incredible legacy of tension and a growing interest in the game at Rugby World Cup. The French, host nation and tournament favourites, were in some danger of going out in the pool stages, largely thanks to their last minute victory over the All Blacks, and even then their challenge ended when they lost to Australia and New Zealand tablet that's very well designed, nice size with a powerful processor, and a super smooth interface. There are a lot of minor details that make this tablet an amazing device, like the integrated stylus, the good performance and the battery life, which of course is very good. But the most important and the best feature of this tablet is the app selection, which you can do without even switching to the Kindle app. Play this
