Combined with player animations, this allows the game to provide players with fully-realistic interactions with the ball, allowing for slalom runs and pinpoint pass movement. “We’re excited to use this motion capture data in FIFA to bring something different and new to the game,” said Creative Assembly’s Matt Bromage. “We know that the best FIFA players in the world can be a little unpredictable, and we’re looking forward to showing that off in the beta.” FIFA 22’s “HyperMotion Technology” is an added layer on top of the game’s existing animation systems. The game features three animation modes to represent three different levels of player speed: Slow, Normal and Fast. Whenever players move at normal speed, game physics are as they would be on average, but as players move at higher speeds, they begin to move more quickly. For example, when playing at normal speed, passing is a noticeably slow motion; players are hesitant to throw passes and make movements with the ball. When playing at high speed, pass accuracy is dramatically improved and players move more quickly, allowing them to exploit greater angles and space for passing. To further enhance player speed and agility in an action-packed gameplay experience, FIFA 22 also features “Fast Zones,” which allow players to react to challenges or reactions faster. Each player has three Fast Zones, which allow them to play faster than normal to initiate tackles and other actions. The system also allows players to use sprinting techniques to achieve higher speeds when attacking. On the attack, players can perform an All-Out Sprint to trigger a speed boost, where they can dash back and forth on the field, before a slower Elite Sprint to reach full speed. They can also perform a High Press to gain an advantage, and can adjust their run on the fly. FIFA 22 makes its first Beta playable this December, and is available to play on the Xbox One at the time of this announcement. The PC version of the game will be playable at E3 in June. “It’s a pretty monumental moment to finally give the fans what they’ve been asking for,” said Creative Assembly’s Darren Richardson. “The people have been saying the same things for years - ‘bring back the stomp, make players run faster,’ and we’re delivering on that
